was with much reluctance that he would have a wife who could flirt se nimbly with every available man.

Needless to say, Mary Smith had pride, and she felt that she was really fortunate in knowing the disposition of her lover before she was foolish enough to marry him.

The engagement was broken, and for a time she stayed within a shell, as it were. Her heart was as big as her mind, however, and instead of becoming bitter and cynical, she devoted her time to reading and studying, and it was a few months after the termination of her unhappy love affair that the president of the company for which she worked caught
